INTRODUCTION

Recent Research Department reports on economic activity in Boston have provided a profile of the City (or Suffolk County) as an economic unit. That perspective is important due to the economic integration of locations within the City. However, sub-city areas are of interest to planners, policy makers, businesses and residents due to links between business activity and workplaces, jobs, income and related services.

Fortunately, an unpublished source of information from the Census Bureau offers an unmatched level of detail on business activity in sub-city areas. The Census' County Business Patterns office provided numbers of private business establishments by size, by type of business, by zip code area for Boston. These data reveal a detailed picture of business activity across the City.

This report is organized as follows: a brief summary of findings (Part I) is followed by a description of the patterns of private business across sixteen neighborhoods and within each neighborhood (Part II). Part III describes the data and method. Finally, an appendix provides a set of detailed analytic tables for each area.

I. SUMMARY OF FINDINGS

Private employment in Boston is spread unevenly across sixteen economically diverse neighborhoods. In 1981, one-half of the City's total private employment was located in Central Boston and Back Bay-Beacon Hill. Most of the other half was found in Fenway-Kenmore, Allston-Brighton, South Boston, South End, East Boston, Dorchester and Roxbury. The smaller, more residential neighborhoods--Charlestown, Hyde Park, Mattapan-Franklin Field, Roslindale and West Roxbury--had small shares of the City's total employment.

The distribution of jobs across neighborhoods varied much by type of business. While Central Boston and South Boston had the largest shares of manufacturing employment, Back Bay-Beacon Hill, Central Boston and Fenway-Kenmore had the greatest concentrations of retail trade. East Boston was the leading location for employment in transportation and public utilities. Wholesale trade was dominated by Central Boston, South Boston and Allston-Brighton, while Fenway-Kenmore had the third-largest share of services employment after Central Boston and Back-Bay-Beacon Hill. In contrast to the other sectors, more than eight of every ten jobs in finance/insurance/real estate were located in the two "downtown" neighborhoods.

Within neighborhoods, employment bases varied. For example, Central Boston and Back Bay-Beacon Hill specialized in services, finance and retail trade. In contrast, manufacturing provided most of the jobs in Charlestown and South Boston, and retail trade employed the most people in Mattapan-Franklin Field, Roslindale and West Roxbury.

The diversity of employment bases by neighborhood and the distribution of jobs across the City suggest that business cycles, economic development and changes in economic structure would have unequal consequences for the neighborhoods of Boston. This does not imply that a more even geographic distribution of jobs would bring net benefits to the City. Current patterns of business reflect desirable diversity in land use and human activity. Rather, this detailed picture of Boston's economy provides a useful basis for assessing or anticipating the economic effects of general business trends or specific developments on business patterns in Boston's neighborhoods.

II. PATTERNS OF PRIVATE BUSINESS BY NEIGHBORHOOD

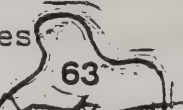

Zip code areas may be used to define neighborhood boundaries that are reasonably close to Boston's planning districts. The sixteen neighborhoods are made up of one or more zip codes as shown in Figure 1 and Table 1. Given these neighborhoods, how do private business patterns look across neighborhoods, by type of business and within neighborhoods?

Private Employees by Neighborhood

First, an analysis of neighborhood business patterns across neighborhoods in 1981 finds an uneven distribution of jobs. The percent distribution of total private employment by neighborhood is illustrated by Figure 2. The northern part of Boston, especially Central Boston and Back Bay-Beacon Hill, hosted the majority of workplaces in the City. In fact, these two "downtown" districts accounted for 53 percent of citywide private employment. The rest of the total private jobs were primarily found in Fenway-Kenmore, Allston-Brighton, South Boston, the South End and East Boston. Each of the remaining neighborhoods accounted for less than five percent of total employment (see Tables 2,3, second columns). The neighborhoods with the smallest shares of total private employment--Hyde Park, Mattapan-Franklin Field, Roslindale and West Roxbury--function chiefly as residential areas outside of the more business-oriented districts.

The percent distribution of business establishments (Table 3, first column) was slightly more even among neighborhoods. Evidently, the residential areas had relatively small business establishments compared to more commercial parts of Boston, such as Fenway-Kenmore and Back Bay-Beacon Hill. Central Boston had a full range of large and small establishments so that its percent shares of Boston's establishments and employees were nearly identical.

Employment by Type of Business

The picture of business patterns in 1981 changes somewhat when jobs are broken down by industry. While Central Boston and Back Bay-Beacon Hill (together) dominated all business sectors, the distribution of jobs across the City varied substantially by type of business. In manufacturing (see Table 4), Central Boston accounted for 34 percent of employment, but several other neighborhoods had large shares. South Boston (15 percent), Back Bay-Beacon Hill (9 percent), and Allston-Brighton (8 percent) each had over 4,000 employees in manufacturing. Apparently, these districts' proximity to major transportation arteries (Mass. Turnpike, Routes 93 and 95, and Logan Airport) was one factor that attracted manufacturing establishments.

Transportation and public utilities jobs were concentrated in East Boston (33 percent), Central Boston (23 percent), and Back Bay-Beacon Hill (15 percent). See Table 5. Logan Airport was undoubtedly the source for most of the transportation employment in East Boston.

Wholesale trade employment was concentrated in Central Boston (23 percent), South Boston (17 percent), Allston-Brighton (15 percent), the South End (12 percent) and Back Bay-Beacon Hill (12 percent). See Table 6. All other neighborhoods had less than 1,000 employees in wholesale trade; apparently, transportation access and location of manufacturing influenced the location of wholesale trade establishments.

Retail trade (see Table 7) was dispersed the most evenly across neighborhoods. Central Boston (26 percent), Back Bay-Beacon Hill (18 percent), and Fenway-Kenmore (14 percent) dominated the others, but only five neighborhoods had less than 1,000 employees in retail trade.

In contrast, 85 percent of the employees in finance/insurance/real estate worked in Central Boston and Back Bay-Beacon Hill, combined (see Table 8). Except for these and Fenway Kenmore (4 percent), Uphams Corner (3 percent) and South Boston (2 percent), all other neighborhoods had less than 1,000 employees in that sector. Boston's "financial district" is well-named.

Services employment was concentrated in Central Boston (29 percent), Back Bay-Beacon Hill (23 percent) and Fenway-Kenmore (19 percent). See Table 9. While the distribution was bunched in those three neighborhoods, the large services sector (168,000 employees) had a presence throughout the City. All but two of the neighborhoods had more than 1,000 employees in services.

Table 10 offers another way of looking at the distribution of jobs in the City. Central Boston and Back Bay-Beacon Hill accounted for over one-half of all private jobs, but the share of total varied by type of business. The central districts made up most of Boston's employment in finance/insurance/real estate, one half in services, about one-third in wholesale trade and around 40 percent in manufacturing, construction, transportation and public utilities, and retail trade.

Business Patterns within Neighborhoods

Analysis by neighborhood provides another picture of business patterns in Boston. Tables 11-29 present the percent distribution of employment in Boston and within each neighborhood. In addition, the tables in the appendix exhibit the number of establishments and employees in more detail (2-digit SIC).

Each of the sixteen neighborhoods may be compared to the City as a whole. In that regard, Boston had an employment structure dominated by services (39 percent of total employment), finance/insurance/real estate (16 percent), manufacturing (13 percent) and retail trade (14 percent). See Tables 11 and 12.

In contrast, Allston-Brighton was characterized by services employment (35 percent of total), manufacturing (18 percent), retail (16 percent) and wholesale trade (14 percent). See Table 13, fourth column. The financial sector was tiny in Allston-Brighton, while construction establishments were relatively more prevalent than in the City as a whole. Health services and non-electrical machinery led all other business types in employment.

Back Bay-Beacon Hill was predominantly an area for employment in services (44 percent), finance (24 percent) and retail (12 percent). See Table 14. In fact, nearly one-half of all establishments were in services industries. Business services, architecture/engineering/accounting, insurance carriers and eating and drinking places were the major job sources. Back Bay-Beacon Hill had more employees in hotels and lodging and insurance agents and brokers than any other neighborhood.

Central Boston specialized in services (34 percent of employment), finance (27 percent) and retail trade (11 percent). See Table 15. As might be expected for the City's downtown, few manufacturing or wholesale trade establishments were located there. Rather, more labor-intensive business activities, such as business services, have been attracted to the relatively expensive spaces in Central Boston.

The opposite held in Charlestown. That part of the City has been more suited for capital-intensive activities: manufacturing (especially food products) provided nearly one-half of the private jobs, followed by transportation and public utilities (12 percent) and services (16 percent). See Table 16.

Fields Corner had nearly identical numbers of establishments in retail trade and services. The latter (led by health services) accounted for 42 percent of employment, the former (led by food stores and eating and drinking places) made up 30 percent (see Table 17).

Uphams Corner was more oriented toward manufacturing (20 percent) and services (27 percent) and finance (26 percent) than Fields Corner (see Table 18). However, Uphams Corner had small wholesale and retail trade sectors. While Boston's private employment in wholesale and retail trade combined, was 19 percent of total employment, the same sectors accounted for only 7 percent of the total in Uphams Corner.

In East Boston, transportation and public utilities (including Logan Airport) and services made up 53 percent and 18 percent of total employment, respectively (see Table 19). Manufacturing (mainly apparel) and retail trade (mostly eating and drinking places) were important sectors (12 percent of total, each). In contrast, the finance and wholesale trade sectors were small.

The Fenway-Kenmore area had the second highest percentage of employees in services (67 percent). See Table 20. Health and educational establishments led a wide range of services. Retail trade (dominated by eating and drinking places) was also important as a source of jobs with 17 percent of the total. Although finance/insurance/real estate accounted for 9 percent of all establishments, the prevalence of small real estate offices limited the sector's employment share to 6 percent.

The highly residential Hyde Park was also the location of much manufacturing: 2,000 jobs, good for 33 percent of total employment in the neighborhood (see Table 21). Retail trade (27 percent) and services (15 percent) were other large sources of employment. In addition, Hyde Park had the highest relative concentration of construction establishments (15 percent of total establishments).

Another residential neighborhood, Mattapan-Franklin Field, had a small employment base concentrated in retail trade (40 percent) and services (36 percent, half of which was in health services). See Table 22. This neighborhood had the lowest share of transportation and public utilities (2 percent) and had only four small manufacturing establishments.

Jamaica Plain was the most services-oriented neighborhood. Health services, social services and the rest of the sector made up 71 percent of all employment in the neighborhood (see Table 23).

Roslindale depended on the types of business that suited its residential character. Retail establishments (food, general merchandise, and eating and drinking) accounted for 39 percent of employment (see Table 24). Services (mostly health and business) provided 36 percent of all jobs in Roslindale.

Roxbury, like Jamaica Plain, specialized in services (58 percent of total). See Table 25. Health and social services were the largest sources of jobs. Manufacturing (13 percent) also provided over 1,400 jobs.

Unlike most neighborhoods, South Boston depended on manufacturing (34 percent of total) and wholesale trade (17 percent) as sources of employment (see Table 26). Printing and publishing, food products and electric and electronic equipment provided the most jobs. South Boston also had the smallest employment share in services (14 percent).

South End establishments were dominated by services (41 percent of total), manufacturing (23 percent), and wholesale trade (23 percent). See Table 27. Leather, apparel and food products led the manufacturing sector. Communication and health services were also large sources of employment.

Finally, West Roxbury relied on retail trade (39 percent of total), services (21 percent) and transportation and public utilities (11 percent). See Table 28. Small sectors in wholesale trade and manufacturing reflect the residential character of West Roxbury.

Thus, Boston is made up of diverse parts. In 1981, the sixteen neighborhoods hosted varying amounts and mixes of private employment. While some residents may desire more convenient workplaces, such diversity in business patterns and land use is an essential element of the character and function of the City.

III. DATA AND METHOD

The data base for this study was furnished by the U.S. Department of Commerce, Bureau of the Census, County Business Patterns. Coverage includes all private places of business; government employers, railroads and proprietors are excluded. The latest available data are based on individual records of business establishments in March 1981.

For each of 53 zip codes covering the City of Boston, the data include types of business by 2-digit Standard Industrial Classification (SIC), total number of establishments, and number of establishments by employment size range (see Figure 3). Numbers of employees were not reported due to disclosure laws.

The total number of establishments in the zip code file exceeded the number of establishments in the published business patterns for Suffolk County by six percent. The published figures have been adjusted by the Census Bureau to be consistent with state totals.* Therefore, the zip code file was adjusted as follows: For each of ten employment size classes, the number of establishments in the 1981 zip code file was divided by the number of establishments in the published County Business Patterns. The resulting factors in the estimates of establishments by neighborhoods.

While a count of the number of establishments is useful, the number of employees is more relevant to planners, analysts, workers, and job seekers. Therefore, the first step in the analysis was to estimate the number of employees by zip code, by SIC. Figure 3 illustrates the method: first, mid-points were computed for each of the employment size ranges; then, the number of establishments in each range times the mid-point produced estimates of the number of employees (last row of Figure 3). For the last range (1,000+), the employment "mid-point" was computed as an average size as follows: The published numbers of Suffolk County establishments by employment size range were multiplied by mid-points for the first eight ranges. Then, the employees were summed over the first eight ranges (344,493.5) and subtracted from the total number of employees in Suffolk County (452,189). The remainder (107,695.5) was divided by the number of establishments in the last range (48) to yield 2,243.7.

Next, zip code areas were combined to form sixteen neighborhoods which have similar boundaries to the Boston Redevelopment Authority's Planning Districts (see Figure 4 compared to Figure 1). Then, for each neighborhood, the number of establishments and number of employees by type of business were computed and printed.

The method introduces an unknown, but acceptable amount of error to the data. The results are reliable for the purpose of describing the location of business activity in the neighborhoods of Boston.

The estimated number of employees in Suffolk County (from the zip code file) is close to the published County Business Patterns total and two percent less than the published Bureau of Economic Analysis total (see Table 30). The differences in construction and services may be attributable to differences of classification of engineering establishments or other business types that are in construction-related services.
